almost certainly a product of intense selective breeding by humans.

They average at 1 foot tall (0.3 M) and 24 pounds (10.9 kg).

Habitat: Fidough do not exist in the wild and have not for a very long time. They are entirely dependent on human care and human habitations to exist, though there are some stray/feral populations in cities, as there are all Pokémon.

Life Cycles: Fidough are small dogs that can potentially reproduce every few months with a new litter of puppies. They are not bound to seasonal mating cycles, one of many products of domestication. These litters tend to be around 3-5 puppies, but egg laying can get as high as a dozen. They are good parents all around and the mothers tend to their babies with great love and affection. Fidough are known to live up to about 20 years.

As Pokémon that only exist as pets, Fidoughs do not have natural predators in the technical sense, but they are small doughy dogs that definitely taste good. Any large bird or other large enough carnivore may find your Fidough to be an easy meal, so be careful.

Behavior: Fidough are incredibly friendly and loving Pokémon. They love to be helpful and make truly excellent companions, and in fact many municipalities have Fidoughs available as starter Pokémon!

Diet: Contrary to all other dogs, Fidoughs (while still omnivores) lean toward herbivory, insectivory, and especially fermented fruit. Their bodies are specially adapted to consume fermented fruits and vegetables.

Scientists speculate that proto-Fidoughs utilized their yeast breath to ferment fruits for their own consumption, and that humans ended up domesticating them because of their yeast breath's ability to make alcohol. Fidoughs might just be the only dogs in the world that would turn up their nose at a steak. For those vegetarians who value having pets that match the dietary restrictions as themselves, a Fidough may just be the perfect choice.

Conservation: Extinct in the wild

Relationship with Humans: Fidough are one of the earliest domesticated Pokémon, alongside Bulbasaurs and Eevees and a handful of others around the world. As mentioned above, Fidough were originally domesticated for their yeasty breaths and thus their ability to turn fruit into alcohol. The domestication process likely began around 20,000-30,000 years ago. The rise of alcohol fermentation eventually led to steady development of agricultural societies as humans discovered more and more uses for the grains that they grew, such as bread, and the yeasty breaths of Fidough became even more important to human society. While there may have been early hunting of proto-Fidoughs and proto-Dachsbuns, these practices wiped out thousands of years ago in most parts of the world, as most cultures see Fidoughs as the quintessential low-maintenance human companion who provide immense value to the household. However, in cultures where dogs and thus dog-Pokémon are/were raised for meat consumption, Fidoughs make great livestock.

As quintessential members of human society, Fidoughs receive special treatment as beloved, endearing family pets, and the majority of households have one for helping out in the kitchen. No respectable baker or brewer would ever be caught dead without their own loyal Fidough (or Dachsbun!), and they are the pet mascot of quite a number of local bakeries and breweries the world over.

As a highly domesticated Pokémon there are several breeds of Fidough that exist, each with unique yeast breaths that provide distinct flavors to brews and baked goods.

Because of their docility, squishiness, small size, and how easy it is to acquire breeding stock, Fidough are regularly used as bait in illegal "dog fighting" practices. An unfortunate reality that is shared with Eevee.

And of course, as popular starter Pokémon, Fidough make their way onto the teams of many trainers across the globe.

Classification: "Panemcanis" means "bread dog" in Latin.

Dachsbun is the Dog Pokémon and the evolved form of Fidough. It averages at 1'8 feet tall (0.5 M) and 32.8 pounds (14.9 kg).

Habitat: Human habitations, the same as Fidough.

Life Cycles: Dachsbuns live similar lives to their Fidough counterparts.

Behavior: Dachsbuns are even-tempered Pokémon with an immense tolerance for children and human shenanigans. They can fit into just about any household with the right care and selection.

Diet: They eat primarily fermented fruits, but will also eat insects, bread, alcohol, vegetables, grains, and eggs.

Conservation: Extinct in the wild

Relationship with Humans: Dachsbuns are basically just bigger Fidoughs in almost all respects culturally and functionally. There are pet fanciers who selectively breed fancy Dachsbuns to be shown at dog shows, which garners annual media fascination. Of course, these fancy breeds are prone to health defects, and the ones given out to trainers from Pokémon Centers as Fidoughs are bred first and foremost for health and temperament.

On the children's television show Tuesdays with Turtwig, there is a Dachsbun who makes guest visits who teaches the audience about baking!

In practical field uses, Dachsbuns find themselves with a niche utility amongst Rangers and members of the Task Force for their unique immunity to both dragon and fire-types (if they have the ability Well-Baked Body). Given that it is often dragon-types and fire-types that local Task Force agents have to wrangle with, the unique immunities of Dachsbun serve to be quite useful.

Dachsbuns in particular are common in preschools and kindergartens for their even temperaments and small statures.

Classification: Dachsbuns and Fidoughs are distantly related to other dog Pokémon. They are, importantly, not part of the Spiricanids and will not become a Greavard upon death.

Evolution: Dachsbun evolves from Fidough at level 26.
