Petilil are a small grass-type Pokémon with leaves that, when eaten in large amounts, cause dizziness, but in smaller amounts they provide a revitalizing effect that helps regain vigor. These leaves grow back fairly quickly.

Petilil average at 1'8 feet tall (0.5 M) and 14.6 pounds (6.6 kg). The deeper the color of their leaves, the healthier the Petilil.

Habitat: Petilil can be found throughout the Asia and Europe, where they love to live near bodies of clean water on land with rich nutritious soil. They especially love flowerbeds and lush forests. However, Petilil are highly sensitive to environmental pollution, and will be one of the first Pokémon to disappear from a habitat when humans pollute it.

Life Cycles: Petilil are born every Spring in litters of dozens, like anywhere from 60 to 90 is a normal clutch size per mother. As one can imagine from litters this big, Petilil are eaten by a lot of things. They are small, fairly harmless grass-types that also taste a bit bitter, and they're snack-sized to a lot of larger predators, such as Talonflames, Sevipers, Galvantulas, Orangurus, Passimians, other primate Pokémon, and so forth. Around 3% of Petilils will survive to become Lilligants, barring extraordinary circumstances. As an all-female species, Petilils must seek mates from other species, with Ivysaurs often being mates of choice given the high ratio of males, and their own impressive flowers and courtship rituals.

Behavior: Petilil are friendly but (justifiably) quite skittish in nature. They are scared of humans and other large predators as a rule. They live in large flocks/gardens of scores of other Petilil, often their siblings by proximity. In captivity, especially when raised from an egg or bred from domesticated stock by Breeders, Petilil are sociable creatures who need other Pokémon around to be happy. Other grass-types are the best companions to give a Petilil, but don't let that discourage you from giving your Petilil other friends!

Diet: Sunlight, berries.

Conservation: Vulnerable

Relationship with Humans: Petilils have been eaten by humanity since we left Africa and travelled into the Middle East. They're small, nutritious, weak, docile, easy to catch, and they breed well in agricultural settings. Even the dizziness that one gets from eating too many of their leaves disappears upon boiling. And, since the Petilils regrow their leaves quickly, there's little need to kill them, just plucking their leaves does the trick.

Their habitats are under threat all the time from pollution, and since they're one of the earliest ecosystem indicators available to science, their presence or absence is a huge tell when something is going wrong in an environment. The main thing that stops Petilils from being endangered in spite of this extreme sensitivity to toxins, is their range and presence in human dwellings. Petilils would make for excellent starter Pokémon if it wasn't for the fact that they evolve into the notoriously finicky Lilligant. But, Petilils are present on the teams of many doctors, herbalists, and chefs who use their revitalizing leaves to enhance foods and medicines. Their presence in the culinary arts and medicine is so prevalent and rooted in ancient traditions, that Petilils are seen as the symbol of herbal medicines and gardens. Many businesses throughout time use a stylized Petilil to represent herbs or herbal medicine, to the point that it is ubiquitous with the trade.

Lilligant are tall, elegant Pokémon with gorgeous flowers atop their heads that always bloom most beautifully in the wild. The flower produces a strong, sweet aroma that gives a heartened feeling. (OG) Lilligants average at 3'7 feet tall (1.1 M) and 35.9 pounds (16.3 kg), and (H) Lilligants are 3'11 feet tall (1.2 M) and 42.3 pounds (19.2 kg).

Habitat: Lilligants are found in the forests and mountains of Asia and Europe. (H) Lilligants are exclusively found in the Himalayas, where the cold, rocky mountains gave the Lilligants powerful legs for jumping great distances. While Petilils are common enough, Lilligants are rare in the wild.

Life Cycles: As an all-female species, Lilligants must seek out mates from other species, such as Venusaur. They will roam forests in bands or by themselves in search of mates, and when a suitable mate has been found the flower on its head will wilt and wither away. When at last they lay eggs, they will guard their eggs enough to keep an eye out for egg-thieves, but once the Petilils hatch then the babies are left to fend for themselves unless there happens to be a Lilligant in the colony. Be aware, that captive Lilligants who have not bloomed their flower for the year are not ready to mate. While Petilils are born in vast numbers and themselves reproduce easily enough, Lilligants are not at risk of death too often and can afford to be picky about when and with whom they reproduce.

Behavior: Lilligants are finicky creatures and not terribly good mothers. While friendly enough, they are hard to please in captivity, and even veteran trainers and first-class gardeners have been known to struggle with coaxing the flower on a Lilligant to bloom. Should their flower bloom and they are then neglected, it will wilt.

Diet: Sunlight and berries.

Conservation: Vulnerable

Like Petilils, Lilligants are finicky ecosystem indicators who flee from polluted habitats and deforested lands. Their populations are spotty and fragmented, but what saves the species from being endangered is the amount of habitat that they cover across Europe and Asia, and their willingness to live in human-controlled habitats like botanical gardens, even if they are finicky to the umpteenth degree. However, the (H) Lilligent of the Himalayas is likely endangered, but it’s hard to say for the sub-species is found at incredibly high altitudes and in remote parts of the world.

Relationship with Humans: Lilligants are one of many symbols of beauty in the human world, often depicted alongside Milotic, Gardevoir, and Lopunny. They are popular amongst celebrities, and even veteran and first-rank gardeners find the needs of Lilligants to be a challenge. The flower of a Lilligent is sometimes cultivated into an incredibly rare and expensive perfume—Pokémon Rights Activists rejoice, the very nature of the flower on a Lilligent means it is treated well and it is happy!

There are parts of the world that worship Lilligants as dancers and beauties of the forest/mountains.

Classification: The species epithets of Lilligent, ruben and tripodo refer to the red flower on the head of (OG) Lilligent and the dancing movements of (H) Lilligent respectively.

Evolution: Lilligants evolve from Petilils with a Sun Stone or appropriate equivalent. The regional form is genetic, so Petilils bred from the (H) lineage will still evolve into (H) Lilligants even outside of the Himalayas.
